

CHARTER SCHOOLS

November 2, 2016

Superintendent's Message

Dear Colleagues,

Among the many areas in which Louisiana educators and students have made great progress, the reduction in struggling schools in our state should rank among the top accomplishments. Fewer schools today are rated D or F than was the case years ago, benefiting thousands of students who otherwise would have been assigned to a struggling school.

At the same time, there remain schools in our state whose challenges are significant, measurable, and obstinate. In dozens of high schools, for example, less than two-thirds of students graduate. In many elementary schools, no more than 10% of students have fully proficient literacy or mathematics skills. In spite of many good plans and good intentions, too often these results are repeated year after year.

These schools are not necessarily in urban settings, nor are they necessarily rural. They are not concentrated in one or two school districts. They are spread out across our state, in diverse communities with diverse needs. No one plan can resolve the challenges faced by these schools, their educators, and their students.

The Every Student Succeeds Act (ESSA) provides targeted resources states must spend on schools with strong, research-based plans to change these circumstances for students. However, this comes with its own challenges. First, while persistently struggling schools typically require outside support, there is no statewide or nationwide inventory or catalogue of effective support organizations. Next, too often the federal mandates to transform low-achieving schools have often become a heavy-handed dictate from state agencies, yielding an oppositional dynamic between states and districts that is helpful to no child.

To the end of resolving both of these tensions, and to the end of providing the most effective support possible for Louisiana's persistently struggling schools, the Department sent a Request for Information to dozens of organizations across the country and across the state today, inviting them to share their vision for what it would mean to assist struggling schools in our state to better serve their students. The organizations we are inviting to reply to the RFI are diverse and include non-profits, universities, start-up organizations and even traditional school systems such as yours.

Subsequent to receiving and reviewing these responses, the Department will invite the most promising of these organizations from within and without our state, with proven track records, to a School Redesign Summit January 18, 2017, in New Orleans. As you know from briefings last week, my hope is that you and your leadership teams will join us for the summit, and that you will be able to dialogue with these organizations. At the least, such a dialogue may spark a vision not yet considered for transforming the quality of struggling schools in your communities. Even better, such a dialogue may spark thoughts on potential partners to assist in achieving such a vision.

Per ESSA, your LEA will build a plan to improve each of your struggling schools, and it may be that such plans include partners such as the ones you will meet in January. Your LEA may choose to submit these plans as part of a competitive grant process to allocate the targeted resources that states must spend on improving schools, and the state will aim to allocate these funds prior to the start of the next school year.

Ultimately, our hope is that Louisiana's ESSA plan will not reflect a state vision to be handed down to school systems, but a series of diverse local visions to be incorporated into the statewide plan. The RFI issued today and the summit in January are two steps. A school system is only as good as the schools to which it assigns its students. Therefore, there is no more important discussion in our education system than the discussion of ending the struggle for schools where it has gone on too long.

As always, thank you for all you do for our children.
